The Robin House, in addition to offering Samuel Jackson interns and student workers a free place to live, provides a refuge from the distractions of normal student housing in a college town like Lubbock, Texas. A lush green lawn in a fenced, private backyard, quiet individual bedrooms well-insulated and away from city sounds, offer a sanctuary for study and quiet reflection to each resident. When opportunity affords, enjoy cooking with the modern gas grill under a covered patio that looks over the backyard. A modern kitchen with dishwasher offers an outlet for the cook in each of us to come forward and grace the generously sized dining table with memorable meals that preserve a sense of home while making “dining out” a luxury rather than a necessity. Four themed bedrooms, like the “Nautical Room” take the resident away from the plastic uniformity of hotels, which often conspire to make us wonder if there really is a warm cozy nook to enjoy the companionship of a good book in peace. The Robin House will not only provide the resident with comfortable and convenient shelter, but often serves to reinforce our belief that individuality can still exist in the 21st century.

As spring thunderstorms in West Texas provide incomparable background for evenings that can fill the senses, Robin House residents have the luxury of enjoying them outside, sheltered on three sides by generous covered areas, including two covered spaces for motor vehicles. An isolated utility room with washer and dryer let the resident enjoy a productive afternoon that is not spent queuing at a laundromat. A quick 15 minute drive to the Lubbock Airport and 10 minute drive to the Samuel Jackson offices provide ideal logistics to the resident, whether preparing for yet another trip or more routine training in company facilities. Wireless internet, two separate common areas, one with television, and a library of paperback books offer residents with different preferences the choice to pursue their leisure activities with minimum distraction to others. At Samuel Jackson, we sincerely hope you have a memorable stay at the Robin House.
